

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."

Digital Literature: Death of Print Culture (Engl 190)

Fall 2010

Prof. Katherine D. Harris

Videos, Blogs, Podcasts & Readings

Due 10/14

Digital Humanities scholarship has exploded in the last two years. Many digerati follow each other on Twitter, post to blogs, and have even started article clusters for the Chronicle of Higher Education. Many of these scholars and artists also head up some of the most intriguing projects and centers around the country. We can't possibly cover every reading, video, podcast or blog in our daily discussions. For this reason, I'm sending you to sift through our list of Online Resources for videos, blogs, podcasts and readings (http://www.sjsu.edu/faculty/harris/Digital_Links.htm).

Choosing your "Text"

Choose 3 that you would like to explore and email those selections to me by Monday, September 27 at 12pm. If you would like to work on a "text" that is not on that list, please indicate that in your email. I will try my best to give everyone his/her first choice; however, our goal is to avoid duplication.

Once you have your "text," spend some time reading/watching/listening to it. The goal of this assignment is to report back to the class the ideas that are represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas. This is beyond a mere summary of the material. "Engaging" with the material means exploring the ideas beyond what is represented in the "text." In other words, go back to some of our readings; or even perhaps offer us a new phrase or term and discuss its relevance to our class.

Presenting & Posting

Presentations are 10-15 minutes each and will be spread over 2 days. Use any visual or audio that is necessary to demonstrate these ideas. Post a 500-word summary of your presentation to the appropriate Moodle forum by October 14, 10am.

A good presentation is one that has been well rehearsed. Presentations allow you to offer a wider array of information to our discussions – make it good!

Grading

A combined grade for both the presentation and the post will be based on 1) your ability to present the ideas represented in your "text" and to engage with those ideas; and 2) for the written post based on your ability to convey the complexity of your ideas in a written format. Please use MLA style if you want to quote from your "text."